

Avoidance and Empowerment: How do Sex Workers Navigate Stigma?

Journal:	SEXUALITIES
Manuscript ID	SEXU-21-0197.R2
Manuscript Type:	Article
Keywords:	Sex work, Stigma, Stigma management
Abstract:	It is well known that sex workers experience high levels of stigma. This research examined the techniques sex workers use to ameliorate the emotional and practical impacts of that stigma. Twenty female sex workers with varying roles of escorts, porn actresses, camgirls and content creators were interviewed. Our participants revealed that they used avoidance techniques, such as selective disclosure and the construction of alternate personas. Interestingly, they also reported that they employed positive techniques, such as being unapologetic and deriving confidence from their profession. We suggest that teaching stigma management techniques could be an important tool for sex work organisations to support both established and newer sex workers.

SCHOLARONE™
Manuscripts

1
2
3 Sex work is the exchange of sexual services for money and ranges from erotic displays
4 without physical contact, to sexual intercourse (Harcourt and Donovan, 2005). Sex work can
5 be divided according to domain: outdoor sex work is usually street-based and occurs in public
6 places, whilst indoor sex work takes place in a variety of venues such as strip clubs and
7 hotels. Online sex work has expanded in recent years: webcam models erotically perform
8 online, content creators sell explicit photos and videos (Krüsi et al. 2016). Outdoor sex
9 workers are a minority, with only around 2.1% of sex workers estimated to be working
10 outdoors (Sanders et al., 2016). Due to the secretive nature of sex work, as well as the diverse
11 and changing nature of the industry (Pateman, 1999) there is a great deal of uncertainty about 12 these numbers, particularly those relating to online mediated forms of sex work (Lanau and 13 Matolcsi, 2022; Scoular et al., 2022). This can lead to policy created on partial pictures 14 (Lanau and Matolcsi, 2022), particularly when sex workers voices are neglected (Klambauer, 15 2018).

16
17
18
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27 Stigma towards sex workers is well documented (Weitzer, 2017) and has far reaching 28 effects (Treloar et al., 2021). Stigma involves stereotyping and discriminating against 29 individuals or a group, based on distinguishing characteristics that are either ascribed due to 30 characteristics one is born with (such as race), or achieved due to characteristics you earn
31 (e.g. through doing sex work) (Goffman, 1963). Goffman further identified stigma as, a 32 "situation of the individual who is disqualified from full social acceptance" (Goffman 1963:
33 preface). Ergo, stigma is not simply a label (although this is an important quality), but ~~it~~ is 34 also encompassing a state of ostracism from the normal, a 'situation'. Stigma has a radius of 35 effect. For example, although it may initially be one individual who is given a stigmatising
36 label, its damaging effects also become ascribed to those who associate with its primary 37 target through a mechanism Goffman called stigma by association. For example, by 38 associating oneself with someone who is involved in criminal activity, society ascribes a 39 stigma to that associate, not because they are also involved in criminal behaviour, but merely 40 because they choose to associate with that person. However, Fitzpatrick (2008: p.294)
41 discussed a remarkable shift in some categories of stigma, whereby previously criminalized
42 stigmatized identities such as homosexuality, have become not only socially acceptable, but 43 can even acquire cultural cache. This shift has yet to be seen in relation to sex workers.

44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57 We now turn to a discussion of the complexity of how stigma is experienced by sex
58 workers and, more importantly, exploring the ways that stigma is resisted by sex workers.
59
60

Stigma Towards Sex Work and Sex Workers

Sex work stigma affects both peoples' views of sex workers and their discriminatory actions towards them. Irrespective of the legality of sex work in individual countries, it is regarded as a low status occupation almost everywhere around the world (Benoit et al., 2017). Participation in sex work has been used as justification to remove children from their mothers' care, refuse bank loans, and terminate property tenancies (Benoit et al., 2019; Fick, 2006; Jeffreys, 2006; Klambauer, 2018; Nichols, 2010). Sex workers are often branded with derogatory labels such as 'hooker' and 'whore' (Sallmann, 2010).

Media representations of the sex industry reiterates and reinforces sex work stigma (Rekart, 2005; Weitzer, 2017). For example, Weitzer (2017) noted that the vast majority of mass-media representations of sex work reinforces the view that it inevitably involves abuse and coercion. This is mimicked in some academic literature which repeats claims that motivations for entering the sex work industry are primarily "violence, family breakdown, debt, addiction, housing [instability], mental health [issues] and low education" (Balfour and Allen, 2014: p.17). Thus, it is unsurprising that when asked about attitudes towards sex workers, common responses are ones of compassion and dismay (Ernst et al., 2021).

Nagle (1997) has discussed how much the conversation surrounding sex work fails to distinguish between voluntary and coerced sexual exchange, something also highlighted by sex work activist Charlotte Rose, "People think they know what's right for sex workers because they're reading statistics under trafficking or coercion" (Witton, 2020). These attitudes are found at all levels, including state level. A 2014 European Parliament resolution stated that, "Prostitution is a form of slavery incompatible with human dignity and fundamental human rights" (Bettio, Della Giusta and Di Tommaso, 2017). Some academic literature has been seen to ignore the intricacies of sex workers lived experience and to group sex workers in with other stigmatised members of society. An example is Rekart (2005) who began their paper thus, "Sex work is an extremely dangerous profession. The use of harm-reduction principles can help to safeguard sex workers' lives in the same way that drug users have benefited from drug-use harm reduction" (p.2123). Nevertheless much, often more recent, scholarly literature is more refined, often due to the positionality of the authors as sex workers themselves (e.g. Grant, 2014; Smith and Mac, 2018).

One way in which literature reflects complexities is to acknowledge the lack of homogeneity of sex workers as a group. Weitzer (2010; 2012) argues that sex workers from different sectors experience different levels of stigma and thus manage the stigma differently.

1
2
3
4 For example, cam-girls are less stigmatised than full-service escorts who are stigmatised less
5 than street workers. Bruckart and Hannem (2013) explore how sex work stigma is embedded 6 in societal structures and reflected in institutional policy and practice. They observed an 7 ‘othering discourse’ weaved throughout society, especially the police force, determining what
8 kind of person a sex worker is, what their “discreditable attributes” are (Goffman, 1963,
9 preface), and what level of risk management should be associated with them. This production
10 of discourse around sex work by non-sex workers alienates the labourer from the process of 11 their own representation (Nagle, 1997).
12
13
14
15
16
17

18 This awareness of hierarchy in sex work has been termed ‘whorearchy’, first noted in 19 ‘Working Women’ by Carmen and Moody (1985; as cited in McClintock, 1992) and was 20 used as the umbrella term for examining the relative stigmatisation of different types of sex
21 work. A popular sex worker run blog ‘Tits and Sass’ discuss that it is not only non-sex 22 workers that participate in the whorearchy, even those who work within the industry have 23 been seen to perpetuate this approach (Kat, 2011). There are many factors that affect what
24 rung of the whorearchy a sex worker is perceived to occupy. Sawicki (2019) explains that it 25 is distributed according to the intimacy of contact with the client, the greater the contact, the 26 lower the status of the sex worker. The closer to the bottom of the ‘whorearchy’, the greater 27 the stigma (Graceyswer, 2020; Fuentes 2022).
28
29
30
31
32
33
34

35 Motivation for sex work can also affect stigmatisation. For example, Rivers-Moore
36 (2010) identifies motherhood as a mitigating factor. Women who do sex work to support 37 children are less stigmatised, but entering sex work to support oneself is deemed 38 “unnecessary...selfish and worthy of contempt” (Rivers-Moore, 2010: p.724).
39
40
41

42 Thus, individuals are not only subject to the stigma attached to being a ‘sex worker’, 43 but also experience additional burdens as a result of intersections and layering of multiple 44 identities. For example, the racial fetishization of BIPOC (McClintock, 1992; Miller-Young
45 2007; Miller-Young, 2015), BBW (Big Beautiful Women, a euphemism for overweight
46 women) (Jones, 2018), people who are trans (Anzani et al., 2021), or even the age
47 discrimination faced by sexually active older people (Towler, Graham and Bishop et et al., 48 2021). These groups have multiple burdens to manage.
49
50
51
52
53

54 Research has demonstrated that internalisation of stigma has a detrimental effect on 55 wellbeing, not only in terms of individual mental health, but also in the way that sex workers
56 access support (Lazarus et al., 2012; Vanwesenbeeck, 2005). For example, Ma and Loke
57 (2019) interviewed 22 female sex workers and found that while participants had experienced
58
59
60

1
2
3
4 stigma in a variety of settings, health care related environments were where participants felt
5 most discriminated against. Ma and Loke found that this then resulted in sex workers
6 avoiding seeking appropriate and timely healthcare. Context then, is an additional pertinent
7 factor.
8
9

10 11 Managing Sex Work Stigma

12
13 Although Ma and Loke (2019) and others have found that most sex workers
14 experience adverse effects because of sex work stigma, there is a limited amount of research
15 on the techniques sex workers use to limit the internalisation of that stigma, the focus of this 16 paper. The most common response is a hiding of their occupation, “weigh[ing] the risks and 17 benefits of revealing their identity” (Ma and Loke, 2019: p.9). In a study of Hong Kong based 18 sex workers, most concealed their occupation from others, and instead “accommodate the 19 whore stigma mainly through closeting, and manoeuvre between a stigmatized working 20 persona (the whore) and a public self of good woman/wife/mother” (Kong, 2006: p.423).
21 Similarly, a study in Australia found that some sex workers concealed parts of their work
22 from their intimate partners but revealed other parts, and that choosing what to disclose was 23 an ongoing process of negotiation (Murphy et al., 2015).
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31

32 In this paper we were interested in identifying and exploring these and other
33 management techniques and strategies. Extant literature has isolated two common techniques,
34 both of which rely on compartmentalising of some sort. Either compartmentalising their lives,
35 as in the case of selective disclosure, or of compartmentalising their psyche, as in the use of 36 separate personas. These techniques enable sex workers to limit the discrimination they 37 experience or the impact that discrimination has upon them, and have been reported in 38 multiple studies that argue against the notion that all sex workers have no choice but to 39 experience stigma (Abel, 2011; Benoit et al., 2017; Koken, 2012; Sanders, Connelly and 40 King, 2016; Weitzer, 2017).
41
42
43
44
45
46

47 Selective disclosure

48
49 The strategy of choosing whether to conceal or reveal can be thought of as ‘selective
50 disclosure’ and has been observed in some studies (e.g. Benoit et al., 2017; Ham and Gerard, 51 2014, Weitzer, 2017). Ham and Gerard (2014) interviewed 50 indoor sex workers and five 52 outdoor sex workers and found that most employed selective disclosure to protect themselves
53 from financial and social consequences. Selective disclosure was identified by Goffman 54 (1963) as a stigma management technique. As Ham and Gerard (2014: p. 42) write, “The 55 issue is not that of managing tension generated during social contact, but rather that of 56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4 managing information about his failing. To display or not to display; to tell or not to tell; to
5 let on or not to let on; to lie or not to lie; and in each case, to whom, how, when, and where”.
6 Other research finds that the decision of whether ‘to tell or not to tell’ is a decision that sex
7 workers make depending on the stigma they anticipate (Koken, 2012; Quinn and Chaudoir, 8 2009).

9
10
11
12 The implication of this strategy is that many sex workers experience isolation from 13 family and friends (Koken, 2012).

14 15 Use of personae

16
17
18
19 Interviewing 50 indoor sex workers, Sanders (2005) found that some sex workers took the 20 practice of compartmentalisation further by adopting two distinct personae: their professional 21 identity and their private identity. This strategy was employed both to prevent clients from 22 discovering genuine personal information and to facilitate psychological separation from their 23 work to avoid negative emotional consequences. The study also suggested that sex workers
24 delineated reactions to their professional and private identities and therefore were less
25 personally affected by discrimination directed against their profession. This draws
26 comparisons to Goffmans (1963) 'dramaturgical theory' whereby individuals adopt a 27 'frontstage self' (a persona that they show the world) and a 'backstage self' (a private and 28 personal self) in order to reduce or even eliminate the damaging effects of stigmatised
29 identities. This management technique obviously incurs costs in terms of emotional labour
30 for the sex worker themselves.

31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41 Existing research therefore documents at least two management techniques that sex
42 workers employ to limit the negative impact of stigma. Both selective disclosure and the use
43 of personae can be thought of as ways to avoid experiencing stigma by curtailing its reach
44 through imposing boundaries. We expected to find similar strategies at play, but we were 45 particularly interested in sex workers who used positive elements of their experience of sex
46 work to directly rebuff and reject stigma, rather than to simply sidestep it.

47
48
49
50
51 A small number of studies suggest that participation in the sex industry can result in 52 higher levels of confidence and self-esteem (Benoit et al. 2017). Increased self-esteem has 53 primarily been found in research focusing on indoor sex workers such as in strip clubs
54 (Bouclin, 2006) and independent escorting (Bellhouse et al. 2015). Bellhouse et al.’s
55 participants were 55 indoor female sex workers who were asked how their profession
56 impacted them. Although some reported negative impacts on their lives, others reported that 57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4 their sexual confidence and self-esteem had improved since entering the sex industry. No
5 research to date has explored how, or indeed whether, these positive outcomes are utilised by 6 sex workers to resist stigma. We wondered if sex workers would be able to exploit their 7 positive experiences of sex work in their individualised fight to resist stigma.
8
9

10
11 Taken together, the literature indicates that sex workers experience a great degree of 12 stigma, and that it has significant practical and psychological impacts. We were interested in 13 how individual sex workers managed that stigma. In line with previous research, we expected 14 to find that they used techniques of selective disclosure and personas, and were interested to 15 see how those impacted on their lived experience of stigma. We also wanted to see if our 16 participants reported any other techniques besides those previously identified in the literature
17 (such as the use of positive experiences of sex work). A qualitative methodology was used
18 since we were interested in the lived experience of sex workers.
19
20
21
22
23
24
25

26 Method

27 Participants

28
29 Twenty sex workers were recruited via an advert on Twitter which was retweeted by 30 account owners who regularly post on the topic of sex work. Twitter was used as the 31 recruitment tool due to the growing number of sex workers utilising this platform to gain
32 clients and discuss their work (Wang and Ding, 2022). Additionally, as many countries were 33 in lockdown due to Covid-19 at the time of data collection, other means of recruitment (i.e.
34 meet-ups and rallies) would not have been possible.
35
36
37
38
39

40 The advert asked for responses from cis-gender female sex workers who worked 41 indoors or online, in order to recruit a relatively homogenous sample, as is preferable when 42 conducting qualitative research (Cresswell, 2013). Potential participants could follow a link 43 on the advertisement to enquire about the research topic, speak to a researcher prior to the 44 interview, and consent or decline to take part.
45
46
47
48

49 Participants' ~~were recruited from three countries, their~~ ages ranged from 19 to 47
50 years old ($M = 28.1$ years). ~~and they were from three countries: UK ($n = 12$), USA ($n = 6$)~~
51 ~~and Canada ($n = 2$). (see table 1). Participants worked across five types of sex work: There~~
52 ~~were six escorts: Independent Escort (who offered full sex to clients in their homes or~~
53 ~~other locations); four Porn actresses (who performed sex acts which were recorded,~~
54 ~~for and distribution distribution sex acts by others); two Camgirls (who performed live sex~~
55 ~~acts via webcam as requested by clients); two Content Creators (who distributed their own~~
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4 materials to clients); Pro-Domme (who dominate clients for the client's sexual pleasure); and
5 six-womenthose who worked in a combination of two or more of those sectors. The 6 participants had been working as sex workers for between 6 months to 14 years. No
7 incentives were offered for participation.
8
9

10
11 INSERT TABLE 1 ABOUT HERE
12

13 Procedure

14 The study was approved by [redacted] Ethics Committee.

15
16 A semi-structured interview schedule was generated through reviewing previous 17 literature and discussion amongst the research team. The interview covered various elements 18 of the participants' experiences and focused on entering sex work (e.g. what was your 19 motivation for entering the sex work industry?), disclosure (e.g. since starting, have you told 20 any friends/family about your job?), experiences of stigma (e.g. have you experienced first- 21 hand stigma?) and stigma management (e.g. how do you manage negative responses?).
22
23
24
25

26 [Redacted] conducted the first interview jointly and then [redacted] conducted a 27 further ten interviews on her own and [redacted] conducted a further nine interviews on her
28 own. Interviews lasted an hour and a quarter on average ($M = 73$ minutes). Interviews were 29 conducted either by video call (5), audio call (13), face-to-face (1) or via email (1). These 30 methods of collecting data were conducted within the context of the Covid-19 pandemic. The 31 data collected was rich and detailed, in line with Deakin and Wakefields' (2013) observation 32 that only significant differentiation between online and face-to-face interview is geographical 33 proximity. We approached the work from a constructivist perspective, specifically by seeking 34 to understand participants' experiences as a subjective truth. In other words, we regarded the 35 subject's experience as valid and has meaning despite it being, by definition, a subjective
36 reality. Participants' accounts were viewed not as reflecting the "true" nature of things, but as 37 being a process of creating rather than simply capturing meaning (see Braun and Clarke, 38 2022). As feminist researchers we were acutely aware that researcher-researched
39 relationships could be considered exploitative (Campbell and Clarke, 2019). To attempt to 40 ameliorate this power imbalance, we invited women to speak as experts through experience
41 and framed the interview as a 'conversation'.
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53

54 Interviews were audiotaped and later transcribed manually or using the programme
55 oTranscribe. Participants chose their own pseudonyms and any identifying information in 56 transcripts was removed.
57
58

59 Analytic Method

60

We analysed the data by hand following the six steps method of Thematic Analysis as outlined by Braun and Clarke (2006): immersing oneself in the data, generating codes, identifying themes, reviewing and naming themes and then interpreting the data into the analysis. We first immersed ourselves in the data by reading and re-reading, whilst taking preliminary notes. The first and second author took notes of their first impressions during transcription and again when we worked through the transcriptions together. We then discussed our preliminary ideas and looked closer at the data on the following readings. We identified what we considered to be interesting elements of the data and ascribed codes to them. These codes were then organised to identify themes that were felt to best capture the participants' experiences and spoke to the research question. We used an inductive approach in which themes were actively constructed from the data (see Braun and Clarke, 2022 for further detail).

Reflexivity

The authors have personal interest and experience in advocacy around the de-stigmatisation of sex work. We were sensitive to the labour involved with participating in research and particularly research fatigue among sex workers, however, apart from participant Charlotte, an active campaigner and advocate for sex workers, no other participants had previously participated in research.

Analysis

As predicted, we saw strategies of avoidance, such as selective disclosure and the use of personas. However, we also saw strategies of empowerment, where women were directly confronting the negative attitudes they experienced. Table 12 summarises our analysis.

INSERT TABLE 2 ABOUT HERE

Techniques of empowerment

In our interviews we found that some sex workers gained a sense of power through their work, despite it being viewed generally negatively (Benoit et al., 2017). The sex workers we interviewed did this by rejecting societal views of how sex workers should feel either by focussing on the positives they experience from sex work (controversial confidence), or by cognitively challenging the assumptions underlying the stigmatising attitudes (the unapologetic woman).

The Unapologetic Woman

1
2
3
4 Most participants indicated pride in sex working, were unapologetic about their job,
5 and enjoyed capitalising from a stigmatised occupation. Grant (2014) states that sex workers
6 should not be expected to defend the existence of sex work - something that is very much
7 echoed through our 'unapologetic woman'. These women did not defend or apologise for their 8 work, nor their attitudes towards it, they just were, in a world that they perceived often to 9 prefer they were not. These participants claimed independence by reversing the traditional 10 patriarchal power dynamic (which assumes women are subservient to men) to flip gender
11 roles and reject the societal views that determine them as vulnerable victims. This view was 12 exemplified by Irish's approach to her work: "I'll meet you, fuck you and leave" (Irish, 45, 13 Independent Escort). Interestingly, "fuck", an active verb, is used as opposed to 'have sex' or 14 'sleep with': terms that hint at a collaborative effort. The word "fuck" is noted as having 15 connotations of male aggression and supremacy (Hobbs, 2013; Schubart and Gjelsvik, 2016).
16 Through Irish use of "I" she was not saying 'we' will fuck, she dictated the action, saying "I"
17 will do this action to you, not for you, or with you. Thus, Irish's choice of language indicates 18 that placed herself as hierarchically superior, she was the epitome of our 'Unapologetic
19 Woman'.

20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32 Irish indicated her attitude further when asked if she had ever experienced sex work
33 stigma directly:

34
35
36 Yes! This was like last year, I had a hook up with some guy, [...] it came 37 out, "Oh, I've done sex work recently", and he literally backed away in 38 horror, kind of scrambled away. [I kept saying] "Do you think you might 39 be whorephobic?" [...] I kept saying whorephobic as many times as I could 40 to make him as uncomfortable as I could [laughs]. (Irish, 45, Independent 41
42
43
44
45 Escort)

46
47 By labelling her partner as "Whorephobic ^{!?!'} Irish redirected the shame towards him
48 instead of herself (Sundén and Paasonen, 2018). This shame and disquiet often comes about
49 when sex workers become visible (Smith and Mac 2018), leading to Irish's need to utilisise
50 stigma deflecting techniques to redirect the shame. Easterbrook-Smith (2022) has explained
51 that there is often a discourse whereby those sex workers who face a disproportionate amount
52 of stigma are blamed for their own ill-treatment. For example, by being visible to public 53 retribution, outdoor workers, or even those that shamelessly announce their involvement in 54 sex work, face higher stigma.
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4 This technique of redirecting towards the male clients by Irish was also demonstrated
5
6 by Flo when describing how she reacted to encountering clients outside of her escorting
7
8 environment:

9
10 One of them actually tried to speak to me once, and he was like, “Oh you
11
12 know you’ve got a really familiar face.” And I was standing there like, “Go
13
14 on. Go on. Say it!” [laughs] [...] And I’ll be honest I like it when that 15
16 happens. I like having that power to make people squirm. (Flo, 24, 17 Independent Escort, ~~Porn Actress~~ and Pro-Domme)

18
19 Flo reported reacting shamelessly when clients identified her outside of her work.
20
21 One might anticipate that Flo would feel nervous and insecure when being recognised.
22
23 However, Flo reversed the client/sex worker power dynamic to position the client as inferior
24
25 in the interaction. She claimed to enjoy making her clients feel uncomfortable outside of 26
27 work. Vanessa, had the same approach where she deliberately confronted people who hold 28
29 negative attitudes towards sex work:

30
31 I just don't let it [stigma] bother me, and I try to do the reverse and throw it
32
33 back in their face a hundred times harder and really upset them [laughs]
34
35 [...]. “You don't like me? That's fine. I don't care. I'm just going to make 36
37 you hate me more!” [...] just try and shut me down, you know? [laughs]
38
39 I’m almost kind of looking for a fight [laughs]. I swear, I just try to throw it
40
41 more in their face because it's fun. Like, if you're gonna be so closed
42
43 minded about something, like, if it's going to upset you, I'm going to make 44
45 it upset you. (Vanessa, 24, Porn Actress)

46
47 Much like Irish and Flo, Vanessa switched the site of stigma from herself to the 48
49 people who object to her profession. In this case she denigrated their “closed mindedness”.

50
51 Irish, Flo and Vanessa responded to stigma through being unapologetic about their 52
53 work and by redirecting stigma towards the people from whom it originates. Ira Levine, a
54
55 long-time adult industry worker, explained that sex workers have an added benefit of the 56
57 'freedom of being a leper' - where there is an advantage to sex work, in the form of being 58
59 viewed as past social conformance (Chapkis 1996). This rejection of stigma is what we have 60
61 termed “The unapologetic woman”.

Controversial Confidence

1
2
3
4 Under the wider theme of ‘techniques of empowerment’, ‘controversial confidence’
5 builds on the technique of ‘unapologetic woman’ by not just challenging and neutralising
6 stigma but actually positioning sex work as something positive. Much literature on the topic
7 reports that sex workers have low self-esteem and low levels of confidence (e.g. Carrasco et
8 al., 2016; Sallmann, 2010; Wong et al., 2011). Limited research reports sex workers
9 experiencing positive outcomes from their profession (Benoit et al., 2017; Romans et al.,
10 2001). Yet many of our participants reported that doing sex work made them feel more
11 confident rather than less. This was conveyed by Luna:
12
13
14
15
16
17

18
19 “...then you get the 'oh you're a slut' and I'm like 'yeah I am, my name is 20 literally Luna the Slut' [laughs] [...] I'm a proud slut! I'm a dick sucking
21 queen and I will make you cum. A slut [laughs]. (Luna, 23, Independent
22 Escort, Cam-Ggirl and Content Creator)
23
24
25

26
27 Luna highlighted typically negative characteristics as assets rather than liabilities
28 (Logie et al., 2017) reversing the power dynamic. This is discussed in a popular blog run by a
29 sex worker under the name “Graceyswer” who details the struggles of sex work through her 30 own experiences: "I realised that being called whore wasn't really that effective anymore, and 31 my reply was more along the lines of ‘yeah, and what, mate?’" (Graceyswer, 2020).
32
33
34

35
36 Our data suggests that the common conception that negative judgements necessarily 37 impact sex workers is not always the case. Luna’s shameless confidence signalled that she 38 rejected the negative connotations of being labelled a “slut” and instead embraced the term,
39 she felt that she was a “queen”, and “proud”. Other interviewees might not have put it so
40 starkly, but they still indicated that they had positive views of themselves:
41
42
43

44
45 “...like the people who you were so worried about judging you, you also 46 realise everybody is in their head about that, and at some point it just 47 doesn't matter anymore. [...] I have this conversation with my mum too, 48 when she was being very [anti-sex work] and judgemental about some 49 things, and I was like, “I really like myself.” Not in a conceited way but, I
50 think I'm a good person, and if you don't want to know me, you're going to 51 miss out. (Kate, 26, Porn Actress)
52
53
54
55
56

57
58 By stating that other people’s opinions do not matter “anymore”, this implies that 59 gaining ‘controversial confidence’ was a process of growth for Kate. Similarly, to Epiphany, 60

1
2
3
4 who stated “porn makes you feel good about yourself, and I always find myself feeling extra
5 sexy and walking around with a spring in my step!” (39, Porn Actress). These participants
6 demonstrated an unapologetic attitude towards sex work and a form of confident, positive
7 attitude that has rarely been reported in previous research.
8
9

10 Techniques of Avoidance

11
12 Due to the stigmatisation that sex workers receive, many choose to try to avoid the 13 repercussions, both psychological and practical, by avoidance tactics, either by selectively
14 disclosing to friends and family, or by constructing an alternate persona (Pachankis, 2007).
15 Similar to ‘techniques of empowerment’, ‘techniques of avoidance’ has two sub-themes 16 which share similarities due to both being avoidance measures: ‘selective disclosure’ is 17 choosing whom to disclose to and what to disclose about, ‘protective personas’ involves 18 psychological compartmentalising.
19
20
21
22
23
24

25 Selective Disclosure

26 By sex workers deliberately concealing their profession, they can potentially ‘pass’
27 (Koken, 2012). Ma and Loke (2019) found that concealing sex worker identity reduced, if 28 not eliminated, gossip, shame and embarrassment. Selective disclosure, as the term suggests,
29 reflects the fact that decisions to reveal sex worker status are usually not “all or nothing” acts.
30 Sex workers may reveal their status to some people and not others, and they may claim to be 31 doing less stigmatised types of sex work than they are actually engaged in:
32
33
34
35
36

37 I've told my friend that I met the guy, but I told all of my other friends that 38 I just do camming. I've not told any of them that I have you know,
39 performed sexual acts on a guy for money. I've just kept it as a screen, I 40 haven't told them that I do it in person. (Belle, 24, Independent Escort and 41 Camg-Girl)
42
43
44
45
46

47 Belle clearly demonstrated active engagement in a protective strategy that avoids
48 stigmatisation for the part of her profession that society perceives as more taboo. She was 49 clearly aware, even if not consciously, of the concepts underlying the previously discussed
50 “whorearchy” (Fuentes, 2022). This links to Easterbrook-Smith’s (2021) concept of 51 ‘conditional acceptance’. Where, despite sex work being stigmatised generally, there is a 52 certain amount of acceptance for less visible forms, or via forms of sex work that require less
53 contact with clients, as where Belle admitted camming, but not full service.
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4 Luna also described situations in which the hierarchy of sex work has factored into 5 decisions around selective disclosure:
6

7
8 [My mum] knows that I do Onlyfans \[a subscription-based online camming
9 [site\]](#)and videos and camming. I haven't told her that I do escorting because 10 she is very old school. She'd still love me, but I know it would hurt her, so
11 I haven't bothered to tell her.” (Luna, 23, Independent Escort and-Cam
12 Ggirl)
13
14
15
16
17

18 Here, Luna perceived escorting as less socially acceptable than content creating. This 19 signals that sex work stigma is not present or absent, but can vary according to the type of 20 work, and that sex workers are well aware of that distinction.
21

22 Although participants navigate sex work stigma through selective disclosure to avoid 23 negative judgement, other participants found this difficult and experienced negative
24 emotional consequences. One participant said, “I had to lie about my job before [...] but I
25 hate it, I fucking hate it that I have to lie!” (Sadie, 41, Independent Escort, Content Creator).
26 Another participant similarly reported, “I love my job so the fact I can’t tell anyone fucking
27 sucks” (Mary, 21, ProDomme). Both participants clearly felt that selective disclosure is 28 restrictive, Mary particularly wanted to be able talk about the positives of her profession.
29
30
31
32
33
34

35 Protective Personas

36 Another technique of avoidance that many participants successfully implemented was 37 to create a separate psychological identity for their sex work. Research suggests that sex
38 workers have their every-day, non-work identity (personal persona) and their sex-worker
39 identity (work persona) (Benoit et al., 2017; Sanders, 2005; Weitzer, 2017). Most participants 40 discussed some type of separation in identity, but it was noticeable that not all executed it to 41 the same degree. Some participants created an entirely alternate persona that allowed them to 42 disassociate from work “I order lingerie for Belle. I love lingerie, but they are Belle’s” (Belle, 43 23, Independent eEscort and Camgirl). Others used their work persona as a costume: “I
44 instantly become an actress and realise that I have to keep a mask on whilst working” (Ari, 45 22, Independent eEscort and camgirl). Some participants recognised that they had two 46 personas and although these are used for different aspects of their lives, they overlap and 47 work together: “It’s me, just a bit more!” (Sadie, 41, Independent eEscort and camgirl).
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56

57 Our participants used different practical strategies to enact their sex-worker persona.
58 Kari wrote stories about polyamory and sex work to destigmatise these topics to readers. In 59
60

1
2
3
4 these she used her own experiences to inform the stories, but wrote under a pseudonym to
5
6 distance herself from the character:
7

8
9 Erm, yeah, I'd say the loneliness is certainly a factor [in sex work]. But I
10 felt a lot more of that before I created my pen-name [...] I was like, okay I
11 can't, erm, talk about this with just anyone, but I do have to talk about it.
12 And so, it kind of became like, a lifeline to erm, connect with the 13 community. (Kari, 31, Independent eEscort)
14
15
16
17

18 This hints at the multiple, often contradictory functions of pseudonyms. Rather than 19 creating distance, Kari's use of a pseudonym enabled her to connect with others. Kari's use
20 of the term "created" rather than "started using" shows how the process was deliberate. Many 21 workers place extreme care and thought into their names, having meanings or links associated 22 with them (Allen and Wiles, 2015). Barton (2006) found that exotic dancers separated their 23 real self from their stripper self through stage names. Construction of a persona involves 24 more than just a name though. In Sadie's case there were marked differences between her
25 personas:
26
27
28
29
30
31

32 Sadie has it easy but [real name] not so much. [...] Sometimes I can't be 33 bothered to work, but that's when Sadie kicks in and takes over [real 34 name]'s issues and basically says 'get your ass into gear, you won't make 35 money if you're not there!' And I like having that persona, I'm able to 36 separate my personal life to my private life and it's actually really nice
37 because one persona takes over at different times. Sadie is very much me
38 but more flirtatious and outgoing. It's just me, but a bit more! And Sadie
39 just has that extra flirtatious side and has more confidence! (Sadie, 41, 40 Independent eEscort and eCamgirl)
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48

49 For Sadie, her working persona was "a bit more", and possibly by default, her 'real
50 self' is actually 'a bit less' due to her editing out aspects of her identity. Thus, sadly, people
51 in Sadie's life who are given access to only one of her personas are missing out on her 52 multifaceted nature. Belle went even further in the distinction between her real self and 53 working self:
54
55
56
57

58 So obviously, Belle is my sex worker name, and then I've got my real 59 name, so yeah so, I think being able to separate the two things, you know,
60

1
2
3
4 like, I do see it as it being Belle and [real name]. And, so when I get
5 dressed, to go and meet a guy, Belle wears Belle's clothes, and I order
6 lingerie for Belle. I love lingerie, but they are Belles, that's what Belle 7 wears, and, [real name] wears different because, you know, we're two 8 different people. And if something bad happens to Belle, that's a different 9 part of my brain that deals with those issues and I have this stronger and 10 more powerful persona when it comes to Belle so it's much easier. (Belle, 11 24, Independent eEscort and Ceamgirl)

12
13 As noted in the introduction, Sanders (2002) described this as 'deep acting'. It is 14 'deep' because it relies on a whole different person, identity, personality, even expression
15 (e.g. different clothing). Belle made a biological distinction between her two personalities:
16 "that's a different part of my brain.", which goes a step further than the psychological
17 distance explained by Hochschild (1983) in which depersonalisation is simply a method of 18 distancing one's emotions while on the job. Belle's language: "different", "separate" and 19 "dissociate", furthers this physical distinction, drawing on work by Goffman pertaining to the 20 frontstage and backstage self. Belle held two identities in which to perform emotional and 21 erotic labour.

22 Discussion

23 We were interested in seeing how sex workers managed stigma in general. We were 24 particularly interested to see if, alongside avoidance strategies, we would also see strategies
25 which resisted and rejected stigma. Our data supported previous findings that sex workers
26 weigh up the risks and benefits of disclosing their profession (Benoit et al., 2017; Weitzer, 27 2017), which we term "Techniques of avoidance", namely the use of secrecy and multiple 28 identities as stigma navigation strategies. However, our participants reported using what we 29 term "Techniques of empowerment" to a greater extent than previous research has 30 documented. It should be noted that all of these techniques require emotional labour
31 (Hochschild and Machung, 2012).

32 Despite the scale of the sex industry, sex work is shrouded in secrecy (Pateman, 1999)
33 and sex workers' use of avoidance techniques to avoid stigma contributes to this continued
34 secrecy/shrouding (Koken, 2012). Of course, many sex workers do not enjoy the privilege of 35 being able to view their work as political or transformative (Perrucci, 2000). It is unsurprising
36 that sex workers use selective disclosure since, by establishing clear water between the sex
37 worker and others, it is the safest technique for avoiding judgement. However, our

1
2
3
4 participants reported a nuanced approach to disclosure which was not ‘all or nothing’. They
5 were obviously aware of the subtle nature of “whoreachy” and chose to reveal their 6 involvement with different types of sex work to different people in their social and familial
7 circles. This demonstrates that decisions about disclosure are not simple yes/no decisions
8 which in turn implies that there is an emotional labour toll to be felt from this ‘dance of 9 disclosure’. Interestingly, our participants did not speak about this as a drawback, almost as if 10 they saw it as necessary to such an extent that it was not seen as a burden.
11
12
13
14
15

16 Another avoidance technique which we identified in our participants’ accounts was 17 the use of psychological barriers. In addition to separating themselves from others by 18 selective disclosure, they separated different aspects of the self internally. The sex workers
19 we spoke to shifted between these personas quite fluidly. This technique has been identified
20 in sex worker’s repertoires before, for example Robillard (2010: p.537) called it a “second set 21 of defence parameters”. Not all our participants talked about this however, some seemed to 22 aspire to a “singular, authentic selfhood”, an aspiration observed by Simpson and Smith
23 (2021) in their work with student sex workers. It may be that this reflects a younger, more 24 aggressive, militant approach to sex work. Which leads us to talking about techniques of 25 empowerment.
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33

34 Many of our participants talked about how, rather than trying to avoid stigma, they 35 resisted it and even experienced positive repercussions as a result of their profession. There is 36 a prominent narrative which paints sex workers as vulnerable, disempowered women, and yet
37 participants such as Irish perceived their clients to be hierarchically below them. This 38 perspective positions sex-workers as the wielders of power (Huysamen, 2019). We note
39 however, that sex work is fundamentally a job, not a mode of empowerment. Our participants 40 noted the irony that no-one would ask retail workers, cashiers, or builders if they were 41 empowered in their jobs. Thus, although at first glance an empowerment technique appears to 42 resist stigma, it is inherently stigma-based.
43
44
45
46
47
48

49 Chapkis (1996: p.20) has stated that, “To act defiantly from within the sexual order by 50 making subversive use of that culture is understood to be impossible”. However, this is 51 arguably what is attempted by the participants in the study, whereby they repel the stigma
52 imposed on them, by being unapologetically confident about the work that is so stigmatised
53 by society. By embracing agency in this way, sex workers are able to uncover and subvert the 54 messages of exploitative structures (Kempadoo and Doezema, 1998). They transcend the 55 stereotype of being sexual objects for men's pleasure (Erchull and Liss, 2014) and are instead
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4 sexual beings with economic resources and social mobility (Rivers-Moore, 2010). This is not
5 to say that these women are empowered by sex work, but instead that they are using sex work
6 as a vehicle of empowerment.
7
8

9 By these women openly rejecting the ‘rescue industry’ (Smith and Mac, 2018), and
10 desiring to be left alone (Pascoe, 2019) they lose their victim status and ideological sympathy
11 (Pheterson 1993). This somewhat complicates the power debate surrounding sex work,
12 whereby those involved are not ‘disempowered sisters’ (Van der Meulen, 2013: p.87) in need 13 of rescuing, but are instead unapologetic women who do not see themselves as needing 14 saving.
15
16
17
18

19 The final observation about our participants’ responses that we wish to discuss is a 20 particularly positive one. We noted that, rather than seeing sex work as a necessary evil, the 21 stigma of which needed to be mitigated through avoidance or refutation, many of our 22 participants saw sex work as a source of personal pride. Participants reported feeling 23 increased confidence in their skills, their bodies, and their personalities as a result of 24 involvement in sex work. Although this is less discussed in the literature than negative
25 impacts, it has been observed by some other researchers (e.g. Koken et al., 2004).
26
27
28
29
30
31

32 It was notable that many of our participants approached the interviews with a lot of 33 humour. Vanessa (24, sex worker) laughs at people who try to impose their “close-minded”
34 views upon her. This is not simply a coping strategy (Sanders, 2004), it is an expression of 35 confidence and ease with her chosen occupation. This confidence, while we’ve termed it 36 ‘controversial’ because it contradicts the dominant narrative of sex work, can and should be 37 interpreted as a feminist tactic of resistance to stigma (Sundén and Paasonen, 2018).
38
39
40
41

42 Limitations

43
44 Much like other researchers who have looked at questions of stigma and sex work
45 (e.g. Simpson and Smith, 2021) it is likely that we found our participants reporting more 46 confidence and positive experiences from their work because of the characteristics of our 47 sample. None of our participants were trafficked or pimped, they were all working in self-
48 directed capacities. Our respondents were all able-bodied, educated, cis-gender women with 49 the attendant privileges those identities bring. They were certainly able to navigate their work
50 in ways not available to all sex workers and thus techniques were available to them which are 51 not available to other sex workers.
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Participants were recruited from the UK, Canada and North America thus their experiences, and how stigma has impacted them, may not necessarily translate to other countries where attitudes, and indeed laws, may be different.

Future Research and Implications

Globally, sex worker organisations advocate for rights and recognition for their members (Parent et al., 2013). Research has found that the more empowered sex workers feel, the more likely they are to be able to advocate for themselves and their colleagues (Benoit et al., 2017). Legal and societal empowerment goes hand-in-hand with individual empowerment. It is interesting that none of our participants reported learning stigma management techniques from the many third sector organisations that exist to support them. It may be that these organisations are very effective at advocating for their members at macro levels, but there is a lack of training offered at the personal level. We looked at a number of UK and US based organisations and saw that they offer a variety of support such as legal help, political advocacy, sexual health help or signposting for sex worker friendly counselling. This all seems to be restorative rather than preventative strategies. In other words, these strategies seem to be focussed on supporting sex workers to deal with the effects of stigma, rather than avoid stigma in the first place. The coping strategies that we have identified in this paper seem to be overwhelmingly developed on the basis of personal experiences. We would advocate for organisations to consider how to equip their individual members with tools to manage the stigma which they will invariably face, whilst acknowledging that this is no small task for marginalised individuals themselves, who form the majority of the staff of these organisations, to perform.

As noted, our sample were relatively privileged due to their identities, we would be interested to see if the same stigma management techniques are found in male and trans sex workers.

Conclusion

In highlighting the roles of selective disclosure and alternative identities our research mirrored much of the existing research on sex workers' management of stigma through the use of avoidance tactics. However, alongside those avoidant techniques we found evidence of resistance, both in the form of a lack of apology, and in confidence derived from engaging in sex work. These findings oppose discourses that position sex workers as victims lacking in agency. Instead of painting a grim picture where targets of stigma are doomed to lives of

1
2
3
4 disappointment and despair (Shih, 2004), our participants reported being able to side-step,
5
6 resist and reject stigma.

7 8 Declarations

9 Funding

10 This research received no specific grant from any funding agency in the public,
11 commercial, or not-for-profit sectors.

12 Availability of data and materials

13 Due to the confidential nature of the interviews the authors regret to say that raw 14 transcripts are not available.

15 References

- 16
17
18
19
20
21 Abel G (2011) Different stage, different performance: The protective strategy of role play on 22 emotional health in sex work. Social Science & Medicine 72(7): 1177-1184.
- 23
24 Allen R and Wiles J (2015) A rose by any other name: participants choosing research
25 pseudonyms. Qualitative Research in Psychology 13(2): 149-165.
- 26
27 Anzani A, Lindley L, Tognasso G, Galupo M and Prunas A (2021) “Being talked to like I
28 was a sex toy, like being transgender was simply for the enjoyment of someone else”:
29 fetishization and sexualization of transgender and nonbinary individuals. Archives of 30 Sexual Behavior 50(3): 897-911.
- 31
32 Balfour R and Allen J (2014) A review of the literature on sex workers and social exclusion.
33 Report, University College London (UCL) for Institute of Health Equity, UK, April.
- 34
35 Barton B (2006) Stripped. New York: New York University Press.
- 36
37 Bellhouse C, Crebbin S, Fairley C and Bilardi J (2015) The impact of sex work on women’s 38 personal romantic relationships and the mental separation of their work and personal 39 lives: A mixed-methods study. PLOS ONE 10(10).
- 40
41 Benoit C, Jansson S, Smith M and Flagg J (2017) Prostitution stigma and its effect on the 42 working conditions, personal lives, and health of sex workers. The Journal of Sex
43 Research 55(4-5): 457-471.
- 44
45 Benoit C, Maurice R, Abel G, Smith M, Jansson M, Healey P and Magnuson D (2019) ‘I
46 dodged the stigma bullet’: Canadian sex workers’ situated responses to occupational 47 stigma. Culture, Health & Sexuality 22(1): 81-95.
- 48
49 Bettio F, Della Giusta M and Di Tommaso M (2017) Sex work and trafficking: moving
50 beyond dichotomies. Feminist Economics 23(3): 1-22.
- 51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3
4 Bouclin S (2006) Dancers empowering (some) dancers: The intersection of race, class, and
5 gender in organizing erotic labourers. Race, Gender & Class 13(3/4): 98-129.
6
7 Braun V and Clarke V (2006) Using thematic analysis in psychology. Qualitative Research
8 in Psychology 3(2): 77-101.
9
10 Braun V and Clarke V (2022) Conceptual and design thinking for thematic 11 analysis. Qualitative Psychology 9(1): 3–26.
12
13 Bruckert C and Hannem S (2013) To Serve and Protect? Structural Stigma, Social Profiling,
14 and the Abuse of Police Power in Ottawa. In: Van der Meulen E, Durisin EM and Love
15 E (eds) Selling sex. Experience, Advocacy, and Research on Sex Work in Canada.
16 Vancouver: UBC Press: pp. 297-314.
17
18 Campbell C and Clarke M (2019). ‘The ‘worker-researcher’: Introducing a new interview
19 dynamic.’ Qualitative Research in Psychology: 1-19.
20
21 Carrasco M, Barrington C, Kennedy C, Perez M, Donastorg Y and Kerrigan D (2016) ‘We 22 talk, we do not have shame’: addressing stigma by reconstructing identity through 23 enhancing social cohesion among female sex workers living with HIV in the 24 Dominican Republic. Culture, Health & Sexuality 19(5): 543-556.
25
26 Cunningham S and Kendall T (2011) Men in transit and prostitution: Using political 27 conventions as a natural experiment. The B.E. Journal of Economic Analysis & Policy
28 11(1).
29
30 Chapkis W (1996) Live Sex Acts. London: Routledge.
31
32 Deakin H and Wakefield K (2013) Skype interviewing: reflections of two PhD researchers.
33 Qualitative Research 14(5): 603-616.
34
35 Creswell J W (2013). Qualitative Inquiry and research design choosing among five
36 approaches (3rd Ed). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage Publications.
37
38 Easterbrook-Smith, G (2022) Stigma, invisibility and unattainable ‘choices’ in sex work.
39 Sexualities, p.136346072110605.
40
41 Easterbrook-Smith G (2021) Sex work, advertorial news media and conditional acceptance.
42 European Journal of Cultural Studies, 24(2): 411-429.
43
44 Erchull M and Liss M (2014) The object of one’s desire: How perceived sexual 45 empowerment through objectification is related to sexual outcomes. Sexuality &
46 Culture 18(4): 773-788.
47
48 Ernst F, Romanczuk-Seiferth N, Köhler S, Amelung T and Betzler F (2021) Students in the 49 sex industry: Motivations, feelings, risks, and judgments. Frontiers in Psychology 12.
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3
4 Fick N (2006) Enforcing Fear: Police abuse of sex workers when making arrests. South
5 African Crime Quarterly (16).
6
7 Fitzpatrick M (2008) Stigma. British Journal of General Practice 58(549): 294. Fuentes K
8 (2022) Sex worker collectives within the whorearchy: Intersectional inquiry with sex
9 workers in Los Angeles, CA. Affilia: Feminist Inquiry in Social Work 1(20).
10
11 Goffman E (1963) Stigma: Notes on the Management of Spoiled Identity. New York: Penguin
12 Books.
13
14 Graceyswer (2020). Looking up at the whorearchy from the bottom. In: Street Hooker.
15 Available at: https://street-hooker.com/2020/04/30/looking-up-at-the-whorearchy-from-
16 the-bottom (accessed 10 July 2020).
17
18 Grant M (2014). Playing the whore: The work of sex work. New York: Verso Books.
19
20 Ham J and Gerard A (2014) Strategic in/visibility: Does agency make sex workers invisible?
21 Criminology & Criminal Justice 14(3): 298-313.
22
23 Harcourt C and Donovan B (2005) The many faces of sex work. Sexually Transmitted
24 Infections 81(3): 201-206.
25
26 Hobbs P (2013) Fuck as a metaphor for male sexual aggression. Gender and Language 7(2):
27 149-176.
28
29 Hochschild A and Machung A (2012) The second shift: Working families and the revolution
30 at home. 2nd ed. London: Penguin.
31
32 Hochschild A (1983) Comment on Kemper's "Social constructionist and positivist
33 approaches to the sociology of emotions." American Journal of Sociology, 89(2): 432-34 434.
35
36 Huysamen M (2019) "There's massive pressure to please her": On the discursive production
37 of men's desire to pay for sex. The Journal of Sex Research 57(5): 639-649.
38
39 Jeffreys E (2006) Contemporary sex worker cultural practice in Australia: Sex workers' use
40 of sex industry skills in public protest and performance. Journal of Australian Studies
41 30(89): 113-124.
42
43 Jones A (2018) The pleasures of fetishization: BBW erotic webcam performers,
44 empowerment, and pleasure. Fat Studies 8(3): 279-298.
45
46 Kat (2011) Less Stigma, Less Money. In: Tits and Sass, Available at:
47 <https://titsandsass.com/less-stigma-less-money> (accessed 22 July 2022).
48
49 Kempadoo K and Doezema J (1998) Global sex workers: rights, resistance and redefinition.
50 New York: Routledge.
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3
4 Klambauer E (2018) Sex work regulation and legal consciousness: a comparative socio-legal
5 study of England (UK) and New South Wales (Australia). Doctoral dissertation, King's 6 College London, UK.
7
8
9 Koken J (2012) Independent female escort's strategies for coping with sex work related
10 stigma. Sexuality & Culture 16(3): 209-229.
11
12 Koken J, Bimbi D, Parsons J and Halkitis P (2004) The experience of stigma in the lives of 13 male internet escorts. Journal of Psychology & Human Sexuality 16(1): 13-32.
14
15 Kong T (2006) What it feels like for a whore: The body politics of women performing erotic
16 labour in Hong Kong. Gender, Work and Organisation 13(5): 409-434.
17
18 Krüsi A, Kerr T, Taylor C, Rhodes, T and Shannon, K (2016) 'They won't change it back in 19 their heads that we're trash': the intersection of sex work-related stigma and evolving 20 policing strategies. Sociology of Health & Illness 38(7): 1137-1150.
21
22 Lanau A and Matolcsi A (2022) Prostitution and sex work, who counts? Mapping local data
23 to inform policy and service provision. Social Policy and Society 1-15.
24
25 Lazarus L, Deering K, Nabess R, Gibson K, Tyndall M and Shannon K (2012) Occupational
26 stigma as a primary barrier to health care for street-based sex workers in Canada.
27 Culture, Health & Sexuality 14(2): 139-150.
28
29 Logie C, Wang Y, Lacombe-Duncan A, Jones N, Ahmed U, Levermore K, Neil A, Ellis T,
30 Bryan N, Marshall A and Newman P (2017) Factors associated with sex work
31 involvement among transgender women in Jamaica: a cross-sectional study. Journal of 32 the International AIDS Society 20(1): 214-22.
33
34 Ma H and Loke A (2019) A qualitative study into female sex workers' experience of stigma
35 in the health care setting in Hong Kong. International Journal for Equity in Health
36 18(1).
37
38 McClintock A (1992) Screwing the system: sexwork, race, and the law. Boundary 2 19(2):
39 70.
40
41 Miller-Young M (2007) Hip-hop honeys and da hustlaz: Black sexualities in the new hip-hop
42 pornography. Meridians: feminism, race, transnationalism 8(1): 261-292.
43
44 Miller-Young M (2015) A taste for brown sugar: Black women in pornography. Journal of 45 American History 102(3): 946-947.
46
47 Murphy H, Dunk-West P and Chonody J (2015) Emotion work and the management of 48 stigma in female sex workers' long-term intimate relationships. Journal of Sociology
49 51(4): 1103-1116.
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3
4 Nagle J (1997) Whores and Other Feminists. 1st ed. London: Routledge.
- 5
6 Nichols A (2010) Dance ponnaya, dance! Police abuses against transgender sex workers in
7 Sri Lanka. Feminist Criminology 5(2): 195-222.
- 8
9 Pachankis J (2007) The psychological implications of concealing a stigma: A cognitive-
10 affective-behavioural model. Psychological Bulletin 133(2): 328-345.
- 11
12 Parent C, Corriveau P, Bruckert C, Mensah M and Toupin L (2013) Sex work: Rethinking the 13 job, respecting the workers. Vancouver, UBC Press.
- 14
15 Pascoe, S., 2019. Charlotte Rose & Eliza Harper. [podcast] Sex, Power, Money. Available
16 at: <<https://audioboom.com/channels/4998550>> [accessed 20 July 2022].
- 17
18 Pateman C (1999) What's wrong with prostitution? Women's Studies Quarterly 27(1): 53-64.
- 19
20 Perrucci A (2000) The transformative power of sex work. Humanity & Society 24(4): 323-
21 337.
- 22
23 Pheterson G (1993) The whore stigma: female dishonour and male unworthiness. Social Text
24 (37): 39.
- 25
26 Quinn D and Chaudoir S (2009) Living with a concealable stigmatised identity: The impact
27 of anticipated stigma, centrality, salience, and cultural stigma on psychological distress
28 and health. Journal of Personality And Social Psychology 97(4): 634-651.
- 29
30 Rekart M (2005) Sex-work harm reduction. The Lancet 366(9503): 2123-2134.
- 31
32 Rivers-Moore M (2010) 'But the kids are okay': motherhood, consumption and sex work in 33 neo-liberal Latin America. The British Journal of Sociology 61(4): 716-736.
- 34
35 Robillard C (2010) Honourableseñoras, liminal campesinas and the shameful other: re-
36 defining femininities in Bolivia. Culture, Health & Sexuality 12(5): 529-542.
- 37
38 Romans S, Potter K, Martin J and Herbison P (2001). The mental and physical health of 39 female sex workers: A comparative study. Australian & New Zealand Journal of 40 Psychiatry 35(1): 75-80.
- 41
42 Sallmann J (2010) Living with stigma: women's experiences of prostitution and substance
43 use. Affilia 25(2): 146-159.
- 44
45 Sanders T (2002) The condom as psychological barrier: Female sex workers and emotional
46 management. Feminism & Psychology 12(4): 561-566.
- 47
48 Sanders T (2004) Controllable laughter. Sociology 38(2): 273-291.
- 49
50 Sanders T (2005) 'It's just acting': sex workers' strategies for capitalizing on sexuality.
51 Gender, Work and Organisation 12(4): 319-342.
- 52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3
4 Sanders T, Connelly L and King L (2016) On our own terms: The working conditions of
5 internet-based sex workers in the UK. Sociological Research Online 21(4): 133-146.
6
7 Schubart R and Gjelsvik A (2016) Women of Ice and Fire: Gender, Game of Thrones and 8 Multiple Media Engagements. London: Bloomsbury Academic.
9
10 Scoular J, Sanders T, Campbell R, Valentine-Chase M, Pitcher J and Cunningham S, (2022).
11 Beyond the gaze – the working practices, regulation and safety of Internet-based sex
12 work in the UK. In: Beyond-the-gaze.com. Available at: https://www.beyond-the-
13 gaze.com (accessed 17 July 2022).
14
15 Shih M (2004) Positive stigma: Examining resilience and empowerment in overcoming 16 stigma. The ANNALS of the American Academy of Political and Social Science 591(1):
17 175-185.
18
19 Simpson J and Smith C (2021) Students, sex work and negotiations of stigma in the UK and 20 Australia. Sexualities 24(3): 474-490.
21
22 Smith M and Mac J (2018) Revolting Prostitutes: The Fight for Sex Workers Rights. London:
23 Verso.
24
25 Sundén J and Paasonen S (2018) Shameless hags and tolerance whores: feminist resistance
26 and the affective circuits of online hate. Feminist Media Studies 18(4): 643-656.
27
28 Towler L, Graham C, Bishop F and Hinchliff S (2021) Older adults' embodied experiences of 29 ageing and their perceptions of societal stigmas toward sexuality in later life. Social
30 Science & Medicine 287: 1143-55.
31
32 Treloar C, Stardust Z, Cama E and Kim J, (2021) Rethinking the relationship between sex
33 work, mental health and stigma: a qualitative study of sex workers in Australia. Social
34 Science & Medicine 268: 1134-68.
35
36 Vanwesenbeeck I (2005) Burnout among female indoor sex workers. Archives of Sexual 37 Behavior 34(6): 627-639.
38
39 Van der Meulen E (2013) Selling Sex: Experience, Advocacy, and Research on Sex Work in 40 Canada. Canada, UBC Press.
41
42 Wang S and Ding R (2022) "Business inquiries are welcome": sex influencers and the 43 platformization of non-normative media on Twitter. Television & New Media.
44
45 Weitzer R (2010) Sex for sale: prostitution, pornography, and the sex industry. New York:
46 Routledge.
47
48 Weitzer R (2012) Legalizing prostitution: From illicit vice to lawful business. New York:
49 New York University Press.
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4 Weitzer R (2017) Resistance to sex work stigma. Sexualities 21(5-6): 717-729.

5
6 Witton H (2020) Sex Worker Rights with Lady Charlotte Rose. [podcast] Doing It. Available
7 at: <https://doingitpodcast.co.uk/transcripts/ladycharlotterose-transcript> (accessed 22
8 July 2022).
9
10

11 Wong W, Holroyd E and Bingham A (2011) Stigma and sex work from the perspective of 12 female sex workers in Hong Kong. Sociology of Health & Illness 33(1): 50-65.
13
14
15
16
17
18
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

For Peer Review

Table 1

Participant demographics

Participant	Type of Sex Work	Age	Country
Ari	Independent Escort and Camgirl	22	UK
Aubrie	Independent Escort	35	Canada
Belle	Independent Escort and Camgirl	23	UK
Charlotte	Independent Escort	39	UK
Epiphany	Porn Actress	39	UK
Esmerelda	Independent Escort	25	Canada
Flo	Independent Escort and Pro-Domme	23	UK
Irish	Independent Escort	47	UK
Isabelle	Independent Escort	19	UK
Kari	Independent Escort	31	USA
Kate	Porn Actress	26	USA
Laura	Camgirl	31	UK
Liv	Porn Actress	28	USA
Luna	Independent Escort and Camgirl	23	UK
Lyra	Camgirl	32	UK
Mary	Camgirl and Pro-Domme	21	USA
Rhyan	Content Creator	20	USA
Rose	Content Creator	22	UK
Sadie	Independent Escort and Camgirl	41	UK
Vanessa	Porn Actress	24	USA

Table 2

Themes and sub-themes with indicative quotes

Theme	Sub-Theme	Indicative Quote
Techniques of empowerment	The unapologetic woman	'I'll meet you, fuck you and leave'
	Controversial confidence	'I am more confident in my body now'
Techniques of avoidance	Selective Disclosure	'Always assess who you're talking to'
	Protective personas	'I am able to separate my personal and my private life'